Charity.

BY ELIZA COOK. They who, bearing heavy burdens over life's most hilly road, Strive to cheer a weaker trother, towed beneath another load; Who, with young ones round about them, where full plenty never smiled,

Yet can stretch their heart and table to let in an orphan child; They who, half-led, feed the breadless in the travail of distress;

They who, taking from a little, give to those who have still less; They who, needy, yet can pity when they look on greater need; These are Charity's disciples-these are Mercy's sons, indeed.

They whose lips, with gentle institct, ever watch fully restrain Random jest or keen allu-ion that may kive another pain ; They who yield their own fond wishes even for a stranger's sake,

Well content by self-resigning, others' happi ness to make; They whose conscience bids them semple o'er some deed they fain would do, Asking if the work of pleasure be a work of dury ton ; They who, in broad, honest dealing, dealing de as they would be done by-These are Charity's soft ring-doves, soaring nearest to the eky!

They who bravely scorne to toriure aught that has not power to turn; They who look upon the mule things, seeing much to love and learn; They who think that hely Metey is for ALL that live and feel-These shall grace the angel's record, stamped with the Almighty seal!
